

Daryl Hague received his J.D. from the University of Washington and is admitted to the bar in Alaska, where he practiced banking and real-estate law. He received his Ph.D. (Comparative Literature) from Binghamton University. He is currently an associate professor at Brigham Young University, where he directs the Spanish translation program. His research interests include translation pedagogy and representations of translation in literature. He has published in leading journals such as Translation and Literature and The Interpreter and Translator Trainer.